ABSTRACT

The Computer Aided Prototyping System (CAPS) is an integrated set of tools that is used for rapid prototyping of real time systems. Prototype System Description Language (PSDL) is the prototyping language that captures the requirements and produces executable prototypes. Prototypes can be created by using specially designed PSDL Editor, which can automatically generate PSDL code from data flow graphs. The Heterogeneous Systems Integrator (HSI) is an extension to CAPS, designed to automate the process of integrating complex distributed systems, where the subsystems can reside on different locations, be implemented in different hardware, operating systems and programming languages.

It is envisioned that the HSI will be a distributed system itself. Users at remote sites need not install the entire HSI system, but only the User Interface for entering the PSDL specification of the target systems. This research is the first step in the evolution of HSI. The focus is to create a portable user interface, which can be used in any environment (hardware and operating system).

We have designed and implemented a platform independent HSI user interface using the Java programming language. The functionalities of CAPS Release 2.0 PSDL Editor are mainly preserved in this implementation with a few added features. The new editor shows significant improvement in performance and user friendliness over the previous versions of CAPS PSDL Editor.

I. INTRODUCTION

The classic Waterfall Model for software development consists of five phases (Figure 1). Among these, the Requirements Analysis phase has special importance. The development efforts start with the description of requirements. This is generally not very easy, because few customers use formal descriptions and frequently, they may not be able to fully describe what they want. It is the job of software developers to discover missing or forgotten requirements, and to understand what the customer actually wants to see in the end. The product may be perfectly error free, but it is useless if it does not reflect the needs of the customers.

Rapid software prototyping is an iterative software development methodology and its purpose is to improve the analysis, design and the development of software systems [Ref. 1].

A prototype is a simplified model of a proposed system [Ref. 2]. Prototypes improve customer–developer communication by demonstrating the feasibility, behavior or performance of the desired product. Hence, the customer can have a better view of his/her needs. This helps developers in identifying the requirements via the feedback from the customers.

A. COMPUTER AIDED PROTOTYPING SYSTEM (CAPS)

Computer Aided Prototyping System (CAPS) is a prototyping tool that is developed by the Naval Postgraduate School Software Engineering Group. CAPS provides automated generation of executable prototypes. The prototype, in turn, helps in capturing the requirements of the end user.

Real time systems are generally very complex and hard to analyze. CAPS provides tools that has been specifically designed to support prototyping of such complex systems. CAPS has easy to use visual tools that capture the high level properties of systems, which in turn produce a formal description in a high-level prototyping language and then generate executable code.

The tools that CAPS uses are Editors, Software Base, Execution Support and Project Control (Figure 2). The prototyping language that CAPS is based upon is the Prototype System Description Language (PSDL).

PSDL is a high level language which helps to specify prototypes. The system is decomposed into subsystems using data flow diagrams. Data streams provide the communication between the subsystems.

The editors that CAPS provides are the PSDL Editor, Source Code Editor and GUI Interface Editor. The primary editor is the PSDL Editor, which is specifically designed to build PSDL prototypes. The prototypes are viewed as augmented data flow graphs in the PSDL editor. As the prototype is being built using the PSDL Editor, the data flow graph is translated automatically into PSDL code in the background and syntactic checking of the prototype is performed as well. The Source Code Editor is used to develop the software packages that will be used in the prototype and the GUI Interface

The Software Base contains reusable prototype components. These components can be retrieved by queries or by browsing the repository once the database is established. This feature saves time by reusing existing components rather than rewriting them each and every time. In the current version of CAPS, the Software Base is not yet implemented.

The Execution Support system contains automated tools to rapidly construct prototypes of real time systems. It consists of a translator, a scheduler, and a compiler. The translator generates code that binds the reusable components that are taken from the software base. The scheduler is invoked before the execution of the prototype to arrange appropriate time slots for the components that have real time constraints. If the scheduler successfully completes its execution, all of the time-critical operators are guaranteed to meet their timing requirements even in worst case scenarios [Ref. 3]. The scheduler also produces a low-priority dynamic schedule that runs during the execution of the prototype and allocates time slots for components that do not have real time constraints. These components are scheduled to run during the time slots that are not scheduled for any of the time critical operators. Finally, the compiler compiles the generated source code into executable binary code.

B. CAPS RELEASE 2.0 GRAPH EDITOR

The current PSDL Editor of CAPS is mostly implemented by Kenneth Moeller in his thesis research [Ref. 4]. The implementation consists of two parts. The first part is the user interface used to build the prototypes. The users of CAPS interact only with this interface. A prototype is built by using data flow diagrams and the graph editor automatically translates the diagrams into PSDL code. The second part of the editor is a background checker, which is actually a parser to check the syntactic correctness of the PSDL code. The parser is invoked following certain events such as changing the level in the hierarchy of the prototype or saving the prototype into disk.

Figure 3 shows the PSDL Editor of CAPS. It basically consists of a Menu Bar, a Tool Bar and a drawing area for the PSDL prototypes. This section will very briefly describe the graph editor and its functionalities.

The drawing area can be thought of as a very limited drawing application. It is used to build the PSDL prototypes. The prototypes are built as a hierarchy of operators. An operator represents the subsystems of the intended software. Only one level of the hierarchy can be viewed and edited at a time. The user can perform certain operations in the drawing area such as inserting an operator, inserting a data stream, editing the properties of operators and streams and moving the location of the operators and streams.

The Tool Bar has eight buttons that choose the operation to be performed in the drawing area. Selecting the appropriate button from the toolbar and clicking into the drawing area will draw an operator or a data stream. The select button allows selection of an operator or a data stream within the drawing area.

The Menu Bar consists of four menus. The file menu involves actions to save the prototype to the disk, restore a prototype from the disk, abandon changes that have been made, print the diagram and exit the PSDL editor. The PSDL menu has actions to change the level in the hierarchy by either decomposing the current operator or shifting to the parent or the root operator. Users can change colors or fonts from the edit menu. Undeleting an operator is also available from the edit menu. Finally, the help menu includes online information about PSDL concepts that can be browsed very quickly.

It is possible to change the properties of an operator. A pop-up dialog (Figure 4) is opened when the user clicks on an operator with the right mouse button. It allows user to change various properties and timing requirements for the operator. A similar but simpler pop-up dialog is available for the properties of data streams as well (Figure 5).

C. RESEARCH GOAL

The rapid prototyping of CAPS will be extended in future into a Heterogeneous Systems Integrator (HSI), which will be used to automate the process of integrating complex distributed systems. The requirements for HSI are not specified as of the time of this research. The main idea is to have HSI reside on a server. Clients will enter their PSDL specification of the system using a PSDL Editor, send the PSDL specification to the server and receive back an executable prototype. Users need not install the entire HSI system, only the PSDL Editor will be needed to build prototypes at the remote site.

The main disadvantage of the current CAPS PSDL Editor is that it is implemented in C++ and can only be executed under Unix environments. A portable implementation of the PSDL editor is needed to build PSDL prototypes under any environment. The goal of this research effort is to overcome these limitations by reimplementing the PSDL Editor using a platform independent programming language.

We have chosen the the Java* programming language for this purpose. Java is a programming language developed by Sun Microsystems and has gained popularity in recent years with the developments in the Internet. Java allows programs to run on different platforms without recompiling them. The main reason why Java is so popular is that small Java programs called Applets can be used to enhance web pages over the internet.

The current CAPS PSDL editor is the basis for our implementation. However, it is not a one-to-one translation from one language to another one. Some new features are added as well. These will be introduced in Chapter III and Chapter IV in detail.

II. REDESIGNING CAPS MAIN PROGRAM

The Heterogeneous Systems Integrator (HSI) PSDL Editor is not a stand-alone program. To edit an existing prototype or to create a new prototype, the HSI main program must be executed first. The PSDL Editor is invoked from the main program. Thus, together with the PSDL Editor, the main program also had to be reimplemented. The new implementation is very similar to CAPS Release 2.0, except that it currently only allows to open/create a prototype and to invoke the PSDL Editor on that prototype.

A. PROTOTYPE DIRECTORY STRUCTURE

Prototypes are placed in a directory structure similar to the CAPS Release 2.0. The program will look for the "PROTOTYPEHOME" environment variable first. If this variable is set as a command line argument, the program will use that directory to find existing prototypes or to create new prototypes. If it cannot find such a variable, then the user home directory will be used as the default "PROTOTYPEHOME".

Prototypes will be placed in the ".caps" sub directory under the "PROTOTYPEHOME" directory. A new sub directory will be created under ".caps" directory for each prototype having the same name as the prototype. Each prototype directory will have different versions of the same prototype as "1.1", "1.2" and so on.

B. CREATING A NEW PROTOTYPE

Selecting the "New" menu item under the "Prototype" menu will launch an input dialog asking the user to input the name and the version of the prototype. This dialog provides two text boxes to enter the name of the prototype and the version of the prototype. If the user leaves the version text box blank, the version number for the prototype will be automatically accepted as 1.1.

A new directory will be created under ".caps" directory containing the prototype name that is entered by the user. The version number is also created as a directory under the prototype directory. This directory will contain the PSDL prototype file, which will be created by the PSDL Editor.

The user may enter a prototype name with a version number that corresponds to an existing prototype. This may be due to a mistake or that he/she may want to overwrite an existing prototype. In this case, HSI will issue a warning message telling the user that they are about to overwrite an existing prototype. The operation may then be continued or cancelled.

C. OPENING AN EXISTING PROTOTYPE

When the "Open" menu item is selected under the "Prototype" menu, the program will look for existing prototypes under the ".caps" directory and list them in a selection box. A different selection will exist in the selection box for different versions of the same prototype.

D. INVOKING THE GRAPH EDITOR

After creating a new prototype or selecting an existing prototype, the user can open the PSDL Editor by selecting "PSDL" menu item from the "Edit" menu. If no prototype is selected, the program will show an error message.

It is possible to edit more than one prototype at the same time, however the program will not allow more than one instance of the same prototype at the same time. An attempt to run the PSDL Editor with the same prototype will result in an error message.

E. EXITING THE PROGRAM

The program will exit either when the "Quit" menu item is selected from the "Prototype" menu, or when the user clicks on the window close icon. In both cases, the program will prompt the user if the current prototypes are not saved. The user can choose to save the prototype, cancel the 'quit' operation or close the program without saving the prototypes.

III. USER INTERFACE DESIGN

The main idea behind this implementation was to build a PSDL editor that was platform independent. We tried to capture all the functionalities of the PSDL Editor that was used in CAPS Release 2.0. PSDL mappings from and to the PSDL Editor are the same. Some new features are added to provide a user-friendlier interface. LCDR. Chris Eagle created a preliminary Java version of the CAPS PSDL Editor that had both application and applet versions. We adopted some of his ideas and most of his class hierarchy in this implementation. The complete source code for this implementation can be found in Appendix D. The documentation of the source code is created by using Javadoc and can be found in Appendix C.

A. ARCHITECTURE OVERVIEW

The HSI main program runs as one thread of execution. Each PSDL Editor that is launched by the HSI main window has a separate thread of execution as well. As described in Chapter 2, it is possible to edit more than one prototype at the same time. However, no two prototypes can be launched using the same prototype file. There are no shared variables used by these threads. Thus, no synchronization procedure is necessary among the threads and none is provided.

1. Program Packages

The program consists of six packages and several classes in these packages. The classes are packaged according to their functionality in the program. Figure 6 shows the hierarchy of the packages. The packages also represent the directory structure of the program.

The images that are used in the program are under the caps.Images directory. They are referred to by using this directory structure in the program.

a. Package caps.Builder

Package caps. Builder contains the classes that are responsible for reading a PSDL prototype file and to construct the data structures that are used to represent the data flow diagram in the PSDL Editor. PSDLBuilder.jj is the JavaCC source file that is used to create the classes in the package.

PSDLBuilder is the program that parses the PSDL file and creates the data structures. The other classes are used for functionalities such as providing tokens. PSDLBuilder contains the semantic actions, which are actually embedded Java code that creates the prototype.

As the classes in this package are created by JavaCC, we did not provide any documentation for these classes in Appendix C. The source code is quite difficult to read. Because of that, it is more convenient to read the PSDLBuilder.jj file instead of the others. Any change to the classes in this package should be first made to PSDLBuilder.jj. Then, it must be recompiled by JavaCC.

b. Package caps.CAPSMainWindow

This package contains the main HSI program that is necessary to run the PSDL Editor.

c. Package caps.Display

Display package contains the classes that are used to model the graphical representation of the PSDL prototype. The data structures that are used in this package are explained later.

d. Package caps.GraphEditor

GraphEditor package contains the classes that implement the user interface components of the PSDL editor.

e. Package caps.Parser

The PSDL parser is created by PSDLParser.jj. JavaCC is used to create the parser files from PSDLParser.jj. The parser is used within the PSDL editor to validate user inputs. If the user input is not accepted by the parser, a ParseException is thrown. This is reflected to the user by an error message. The parser accepts the user input if it does not violate the grammar rules.

The grammar rules that are used to create the parser are the same as Appendix A. Appendix B contains PSDLParser.jj and PSDLBuilder.jj for reference. Like the PSDLBuilder package, no documentation for the classes of this package is provided. The source code of this package is difficult to trace. We recommend to refer to PSDLParser.jj file. Again, any changes to the source code must be made via the PSDLParser.jj file. This file then must be compiled by JavaCC to create the parser.

f. Package caps.PSDL

The caps.PSDL package contains the classes that implement the data structures that are used to represent the PSDL prototype.

2. The Architecture

The HSI program consists of the main program and the PSDL editor. The PSDL editor must be launched from the main program. The entire program is written in Java, and is platform independent. It can be executed on any machine or operating system where a Jdk1.2 compatible Java runtime environment can be found. As Java does not allow global variables, each class has its own fields and methods that is written in an object-oriented way.

Figure 7 shows the data flow between the major modules of the program. The main program invokes the PSDLBuilder, which reads the prototype from file and constructs the data structure. The main program provides the prototype data structures to the PSDL Editor. The data flow diagrams are constructed by the PSDL Editor routines. PSDL Parser validates user inputs during the modification of the prototype. CreatePsdl routine maps the data structures to PSDL and saves the prototype to disk.

B. DATA STRUCTURES

The PSDL Editor maintains two kinds of data structures. One of these data structures is a tree that represents the prototype components as nodes in the tree. If an operator is composite, operators corresponding to the vertices in its data flow diagram implementation are represented as its children nodes. If the component is an atomic operator or a stream, then it is a leaf node in the tree hierarchy.

The other data structure is a vector that holds display components as its components. These display components are the current operator's children components. As the user navigates through the prototype, this vector is updated continuously to hold the children of the current operator. The data structures and their hierarchy are shown in Figure 8.

1. Data Flow Components

A DataFlowComponent is the parent class of an Edge and a Vertex. The common fields of Vertex and Edge are abstracted in the DataFlowComponent. DataFlowComponent itself is implemented as a subclass of DefaultMutableTreeNode.

2. Display Components

DisplayComponents objects are used to represent Data Flow Diagram Components visually on the drawing panel. DisplayComponent is an abstract class and contains the common fields and methods of the DisplayVertex and EdgePath classes.

DisplayVertex class has a Vertex field. It does not contain any information about the PSDL components. To view a Vertex on the drawing panel, it queries necessary fields from its associated Vertex field. These are values such as x and y locations of the component, color of the component, etc. The shape field of DisplayVertex holds either a rectangle object or a circle object according to the type of the Vertex.

EdgePath class is implemented similar to the DisplayVertex class. Its shape object is implemented as a GeneralPath object from the java.awt.geom package. It also queries values from its associated Edge object to display the component on the drawing panel.

C. PSDL MAPPING

The mapping of PSDL from and to the Editor is implemented in the same way as CAPS Release 2.0. Chapter 4 of Reference 4 describes these mappings. The focus of the Editor is again on the current operator. All modifications are performed on the current operator except the global data types and the properties windows for the child operators and streams.

PsdlBuilder package is responsible for mapping PSDL to the Graph Editor data structures. CAPS Release 2.0 maintained two copies of the data structures, one for the Graph Editor and one for the Background Checker. This redundancy crippled the performance of the program. This implementation maintains one copy of these data structures throughout the program. This improves the performance as no synchronization is necessary for the redundant copy.

CreatePsdl class maps the PSDL Editor data structures to PSDL. It starts from the root operator and visits all the children and sub-children. While visiting an operator, it extracts the fields of the operator and creates PSDL code.

D. SYNTACTIC VALIDATIONS

The prototype is first validated by the PsdlBuilder while it is read from file. An error message will appear if a syntactic error is found in the PSDL file. The program will stop at this point. Thus, the PSDL Editor cannot modify or view a corrupted prototype file. As the PsdlBuilder successfully parses the prototype file, it constructs the data structures as well.

A second type of validation is performed when the PSDL code is created by the CreatePsdl routine. The PsdlParser is invoked with the created PSDL code. If the parsing of the code is successful, the prototype is saved in the file. If it is not, an error message is displayed.

The third type of syntactic validations takes place during the modifications of the operators and streams in the PSDL Editor. Each user input is validated by invoking the PsdlParser routines.

PsdlParser routine contains only static methods. An object of this class need not be created to perform parsing. This allows partial parsing of PSDL grammar productions. GrammarCheck routine calls the necessary productions rules in PsdlParser. The input is accepted if the PsdlParser returns without throwing a ParseException. Otherwise, the user is informed that the input is not syntactically correct. Figure 9 shows an error message that is displayed when an attempt is made to acknowledge a syntactically incorrect "Parent Specification".

IV. USER INTERFACE IMPLEMENTATION

The main purpose of the PSDL Editor is to construct a PSDL prototype via a user friendly and easy to use graphical interface. The PSDL Editor of CAPS Release 2.0 managed to capture most of the PSDL constructs. Basic PSDL constructs could be directly synthesized from the Data Flow Diagram. Those Basic features of PSDL were enough for novice users to build executable prototypes. Users with more advanced knowledge of PSDL could use pop-up editors to create more complex constructs.

The graphical interface of this implementation is largely the same as CAPS Release 2.0. There are a few enhancements that make the use of the Editor easier. The Data Flow Diagram and their symbols are the same. However, manipulation of the data flow components on the diagram has changed slightly.

This implementation captures the PSDL constructs the same way as CAPS Release 2.0. Thus, users of previous versions will have no adaptation problems using this implementation.

A. PSDL EDITOR ENVIRONMENT

Almost all of the user interface components are implemented using Java Swing* components. The Swing library provides lightweight components, which execute more efficiently than the standard AWT components. Java Standard Look and Feel is used for the implementation, which gives a platform independent Look and Feel. Executing the program under Windows or Solaris will result in the same user interface. It was also possible to use Windows style or Motif style look and feel, but the main idea behind this research was to implement HSI in a platform independent way.

1. PSDL Editor Layout

The Graph Editor layout has been changed in this implementation with a few added features. However, the functionality of the Editor is the same: to allow the user to create the specifications of an operator and its data flow implementation. It is still not possible to view or edit source language implementation (e.g. Ada or TAE) of an operator from the PSDL Editor.

The Editor consists of six main components as shown in Figure 10. These components and their functionality are explained in the following sections.

a. Main Window

This window is a JFrame object that holds the other components inside. It can not be run as a stand-alone program and must be invoked from the HSI main window by selecting the Edit-PSDL menu. To execute the PSDL Editor main window, either a new prototype must be created or a parsable prototype file must be provided. If a new prototype is created, the main window will open with an empty prototype. If an existing prototype is selected, the main window will construct the data flow diagram that it parses from the prototype file. In either case, the name of the prototype file will appear on the Title Bar as the name of the current prototype.

The main window will be initialized as an 800x600 window, and it will be placed in the middle of the screen. Thus, it is not recommended to use the editor with a resolution less than the specified size. However, it is still possible to resize the window after it is constructed.

The main window can be closed by using the 'Exit' menu item in the 'File' menu, or by clicking on the 'close window' icon ( ) on the title bar. If the prototype has changed since the main window has opened, the program will prompt the user to save the prototype. The program will exit without saving the changes if 'no' is selected. The window closing operation can also be cancelled without changing the status of the prototype.

b. Menu Bar

The menu bar provides five pull down menus. Figure 11 depicts the menu

bar and menu selection. The menus and the menu items are selected by using the left mouse button. Navigating through the menu items will also display the functionality of the menu item on the status bar.

Not all the menu items are available at the same time. If a menu item is not available for a specific situation, it will be grayed out and an attempt to use the item will have no effect. The functionality and availability of the menu items are displayed in Table 1.

Some menu items are check box menu items. Selecting and deselecting the check box menu items will turn on and off the option.

c. Tool Bar

The Tool Bar is located under the Menu Bar and contains eight buttons. The first three of these buttons are used to insert data flow components into the drawing panel. An operator, a terminator or a stream will be placed into the drawing panel when the mouse is first pressed on the button, and then on the drawing panel. There are two ways that components can be placed into the drawing panel. If 'Auto Select Mode' is selected under the 'View' menu, the editor will enter into the Select mode after a component is placed. Otherwise, components will be placed into the drawing panel continuously, i.e., each time the mouse button is pressed on the drawing panel, a new component will be added to the data flow diagram.

The fourth button is used to select components from the data flow diagram. The functionalities of the remaining four buttons are described in Table 2. They open editor windows to view or modify the properties of the parent operator of the current data flow diagram. An exception to that is the Types button, which opens a text editor window to modify the properties of the global data types.

Tool Bar buttons also provide tool tips. Placing the mouse over a button will display the tool tip after two seconds. Tool tips can be enabled or disabled from the view menu.

d. Tree Panel

One of the new features of this implementation is the Tree Panel that is placed to the left of the Drawing Panel (Refer to Figure 10). In CAPS Release 2.0, there was no global view of the PSDL prototype. The user had to traverse all intermediate nodes to modify a child operator that was five levels down. It was quite a time consuming operation when the prototype would be checked syntactically in every visited operator.

Tree Panel provides global view of the PSDL Data Flow Graph hierarchy. The root operator is placed at the top of the Tree Panel. The children of an operator are placed under their parent. Expanding a parent operator make it children visible in the Tree Panel while collapsing the parent operator will hide them.

Component	Icon
Composite operator	0
Atomic operator	0
Composite terminator
Atomic terminator
Stream	↑
State stream	↑

Table 3. Tree Panel Icons

Selecting a component on the Tree Panel will have different effects according to its type. If the component is a stream, it will be the same as if the select button on the toolbar is pressed and then the stream itself is selected. It does not matter which level the current data flow diagram represents, the drawing panel will automatically change its level to the selected stream's level. If the selected component is an operator or a terminator, the effect will be the same as if the component is decomposed. If the operator is already composite, the children of the operator will be visible in the drawing panel.

If the operator is atomic, a blank data flow diagram will be opened to place new components as its children.

Each component is represented on the Tree Panel by both its name and an icon specifying the type of the component. Table 3 shows the icons that are used on the Tree Panel. The Tree Panel also supports horizontal and vertical scroll bars that are automatically placed when there is not enough space to represent the components.

The Tree Panel can be hidden to provide more space for the Drawing Panel. This action can be performed either by clicking on the small triangle icons that are on the separator or by de-selecting "Tree View" menu item from the "View" menu.

e. Drawing Panel

Data Flow Components are displayed in the Drawing Panel. The size of the drawing panel is fixed to 1024x768. Changing the size of the Main Window will have no effect on the size of the Drawing Panel. Both vertical and horizontal scroll bars are provided to access the unseen areas of the Drawing Panel.

f. Status Bar

A status Bar is located in the lower part of the Main Window and provides feedback to the user. Two kinds of information are available from the status bar. According to whether or not the prototype has been modified, the status bar will display either "Save Required" or "Save Not Required".

The second kind of information is provided when the mouse is placed on a button in the tool bar or on a menu item. The functionality of the buttons and menu items are displayed as mini-help in the status bar. It is not necessary to press the buttons for the Status Bar to display their functionality.

2. Cursor Types

There are three types of cursors that are used within the PSDL Editor. Hand Cursor is used when the editor is in the select mode and the mouse is over a data flow component on the display area. Hand cursor is also displayed when the mouse is over the label of a component, or met of an operator, or latency of a stream.

Move cursor is displayed during the relocation of a component or a label on the drawing panel. It is also used when an operator is resized. For all other purposes, the arrow shaped default cursor is used.

3. Mouse Interface

The PSDL Editor assumes a two-button mouse. The right mouse button is only used to launch a pop-up menu that is used to change the properties of a component on the drawing panel. This is accomplished by placing the mouse over a component or a label (the cursor will change to hand-cursor at this point) and pressing the right-mouse button. For all other features, the left-mouse button is used.

Hot keys provide quick access to most of the menu item functionalities. Hot keys are also identified in the menu items. Table 4 shows the hot keys and their associated menus and menu items.

B. DATA FLOW DIAGRAM

The implementation of composite operators is displayed in the drawing panel. Objects that are used to represent the data flow diagram components are the same as those that are used in CAPS Release 2.0. The PSDL Grammar has productions to support constructing a data flow diagram from a PSDL file.

Visual modification of components on the drawing panel is available to improve readability of the diagram. They include resizing objects, moving them from one place to another and changing colors and fonts. These are explained in the following sections.

1. Data Flow Diagram Symbols

Figure 12 shows the symbols that are used to represent the data flow diagram components. Circles represent operators, rectangles represent terminators and lines represent streams.

PSDL data flow graph consists of a network of operators. An atomic operator is implemented by a supported programming language while a composite operator is implemented by a network of PSDL operators. Terminators are a special kind of operator. They represent the systems or subsystems that lie outside of the intended system. These systems or subsystems have a maximum execution time of zero since their processing time should be excluded from the total time spent on the intended system during prototype execution. Composite operators are represented by double circles and composite terminators are represented by double rectangles.

The distinction between streams and state streams is specified by using a thicker line for the state streams. The direction of data flow from source to the destination is indicated by an arrow.

Streams that enter or exit a composite operator are specified as EXTERNAL in the implementation of the operator. The source or the destination of the stream may be EXTERNAL, but not both.

2. Drawing Data Flow Components

For convenience to the users, there are two ways to draw components on the drawing panel. If the "Auto Select Mode" menu item is not checked from the "View" menu, the selected drawing tool from the tool bar will remain active until another one is selected. This provides CAPS Release 2.0-style placement of the components, as many of the selected components can be drawn without reselecting them from the Tool Bar.

In the second way, if the "Auto Select Mode" is checked, the PSDL Editor will enter into "Select Mode" as if the "Select" button from the Tool Bar is pressed after a component is drawn into the drawing panel. For successive drawings, the tools must be selected from the Tool Bar each time.

a. Operators and Terminators

The procedures to draw or modify operators and terminators are the same. From now on, we will only describe drawing operators. The same procedures can be applied to the terminators as well.

An operator is drawn by first pressing and releasing the operator button from the Tool Bar and then performing a left-click over the desired location of the operator in the drawing panel.

The PSDL Editor remembers the current font and the current color. A new operator that is drawn into the drawing panel will be drawn in the current color of the editor. Similarly, labels (including met and latency) will be specified in the current font of the editor. These properties can be changed as described later.

Inserting a new operator or a new stream will automatically update the tree panel. The name of the operator or the stream will be visible under its parent operator.

b. Streams

A stream consists of a set of control points. To draw a stream, the streams button form the Tool bar is clicked first. Control points are added with each left-click on the drawing panel. The first control point is the source of the stream. Performing a left-click when the cursor is over an operator will assign it as the source of the stream. Any number of intermediate control points can then be added to the stream's path by left clicking on the empty areas. The last control point is the destination of the stream. By left-clicking over the destination operator, the drawing of the stream is complete. The stream will be drawn from the source to the destination with an arrowhead on the destination side.

Figure 13 shows how a stream is constructed. The stream is not actually drawn following the control points. Internal to the implementation, more control points are added to the path of the stream. The midpoint of two control points is added as a new control point. Insertion of the intermediate points provide a smooth curve.

For composite operators, input and output streams to the composite operators are specified as EXTERNAL in their implementation. Drawing a stream from EXTERNAL to another operator is the same except that the mouse is clicked on an empty area to specify EXTERNAL as the source. If the destination is EXTERNAL, the stream is constructed normally until the destination operator. Instead of selecting an operator as destination, the cursor is located on an empty area and right mouse button is clicked. This will draw an operator-to-EXTERNAL stream.

The insertion of a stream into the Data Flow Graph can be cancelled any time during the construction of the stream by hitting "Esc" from the keyboard. All of the intermediate control points will be deleted from the Drawing Panel.

c. Labels

Labels represent the name of the component, the maximum execution time of operators and terminators and the latency of streams. They are placed relative to the position of the component. For operators and terminators, labels are placed relative to the center of the component. For streams, labels are placed relative to the mid-control point.

3. Modifying the Data Flow Diagram

a. Selecting Components

Data Flow Components are selected from the drawing panel when the editor is in the Select mode. This can be provided either by clicking on the select button on the tool bar or by enabling "Auto Select mode" menu item from the "View" menu. The cursor will change to the hand cursor when the mouse is over the component. For streams, this will happen when the mouse is over or near one of the control points.

Another way to select a stream is to click on the name of the stream from the tree panel. This is a more convenient method especially when the stream is in another level of decomposition. The level of the graph will be changed automatically to the level of the selected stream.

Labels are selected the same way as the operators are selected. The cursor will change to hand cursor over the label and when selected, handle points will appear around the label.

Figure 14 shows a selected operator and a selected stream. Component handles are shown as small squares to notify the user that the component is selected.

b. Relocating Components

Components can be relocated on the drawing panel to improve the readability of the graph. To accomplish this, the editor must be in the Select mode and the component that is to be relocated must be selected by clicking on the component. Component handles will be visible at this point as shown in Figure 14.

To move operators and terminators, the user must press the left mouse button over the component and drag the component to its new location. The drawing panel is continuously updated while dragging the component. Paths of input and output streams of the relocated component are altered while the component is dragged. The intermediate control points of the streams are not changed, only the end point towards the relocated component is updated.

Streams can not be completely moved in the drawing panel since they are tied at both ends by their source and destination. But stream paths can be changed. To do this, one of the control points must be dragged to a new location. Other control points will be updated to preserve the smoothness of the path.

Moving components will also carry their labels to their new relative location. The labels themselves can also be relocated to a new offset value. To do this, move the cursor over the label (the cursor will be changed to the hand cursor), press the left mouse button and drag the label to a new location.

We provided a new functionality in this implementation that would be useful when the user wants to place a component in an area where there is not enough space. In CAPS Release 2.0, the user had to move the components one by one, which would change the look of the graph differently than its original version. With this implementation, it is possible to select all of the components in the current level and move them to a new location. This is done by choosing "Select All" menu item from the "View" menu. The handles of all the components and labels will be visible at this point. Then, by pressing left mouse button over any component or label and dragging the mouse will relocate all the components to a new location. Left clicking the mouse in an open area of the drawing panel will de-select the components.

While moving components, it is not possible to go out of the area of the drawing panel. The component will stop on the border where it is still visible and will not move further with mouse movements. It will only move again when the mouse is dragged towards the inside of the drawing panel. This functionality is also available when labels are moved by themselves. However, labels may go out of the visible area when a component is moved, causing the relative location of the label to go into the invisible area. When this happens, the user should first relocate the label to another side of the operator before moving the operator towards the border of the drawing panel.

c. Resizing Components

Only operators and terminators can be resized. The operator is selected first. Then, the mouse is placed over one of the handles and dragged to a new location.

The operator will be resized towards the direction of the dragging operation. The drawing panel is again continuously updated while resizing operators. Labels will move to a new location relative to the new center of the component. It is not possible to resize the component towards the invisible area of the drawing panel.

d. Using the Pop-up Menu

A pop-up menu will appear when the editor is in select mode and a rightclick is performed while the mouse is over a component. This pop-up menu is the same for operators and streams except that decompose and color menu items are disabled for the streams. The pop-up menu will also appear with a right click over the associated labels of the components.

Figure 15 depicts the pop-up menu that is opened for an operator. Decompose, color, font and delete menu items have the same functionality as their corresponding menu items from the menu bar as explained in Table 1.

Selecting the properties menu item will launch the properties window for the component. The properties window and its functionality will be explained later in this chapter. It can also be launched by double-clicking with the left mouse button while the mouse is over a component or over the label of a component.

e. Deleting Components

Deleting procedure for operators and streams are the same. The component is selected first. It can then be deleted by using the "delete" menu item from the pop-up menu or from the "Edit" menu. It is also possible to delete the component by using the DELETE key form the keyboard. If a component is deleted from the drawing panel, it will also be deleted from the tree panel.

Deleting an operator will also delete its input and output streams. Deleting a composite operator will delete all of the sub-components of that operator.

e. Changing Colors

The fill colors of the operators can be changed to improve the readability of the diagram. This feature is not available for streams. The PSDL Editor maintains a current color value and it is initialized as the color white during startup. The value of the current color can be changed from the "Color" menu item which is in "View" menu. As shown in Figure 16, a dialog window will appear prompting the user to select a color value. Once a value is selected from this dialog window, it will remain as the current color until a new value is specified using the same method. All operators and terminators that are placed on the drawing panel are painted with the current color of the editor.

The color of an existing component can be changed by using the "Color" menu item from the pop-up menu. Right clicking on a component, as explained earlier, will launch the pop-up menu. The color dialog window as in Figure 16 will appear when "Color" menu item is selected. The color of the operator will be changed immediately to the color value that is selected from the dialog window. This operation is effective only for the selected component.

f. Changing Fonts

Fonts are used for the labels of the components. Changing fonts is similar to changing colors. Fonts can be specified to be the current font of the editor for future components. Again, it is possible to change the font of only the selected component. One difference is that changing fonts is also available for the streams. Figure 17 depicts the font selection dialog.

4. Navigating the Prototype

As mentioned earlier, a PSDL prototype consists of a network of operators. The PSDL Editor displays the data flow diagram of only one operator at a time. It is possible to traverse and view the other levels of the hierarchy as well. There are four ways to navigate through the hierarchy.

The "PSDL" menu provides three menu items. "Go to Parent" and "Decompose" menu items will traverse the prototype one level up or one level down. "Go to Root" menu item is a shortcut to directly traverse to the root operator. All of these functionalities can also be invoked by Hot Keys as described in Table 4.

Another way to decompose an operator or a terminator is to use the "Decompose" menu item from the pop-up menu. The pop-up menu opens when a right-click is performed over the selected component.

The last and the most convenient way to traverse the prototype hierarchy is to use the tree panel. Selecting an operator from the tree panel will automatically decompose that operator and the children of the selected operator will be displayed in the drawing panel. If the selected operator has no children, the drawing panel will display a blank page. But, the operator will not become a composite operator until at least one component is placed as its child. If a stream is selected from the tree panel, the level will be automatically changed to the level containing the stream, and the stream handles will be displayed in the drawing panel.

5. Printing the Data Flow Diagram

Selecting the "Print" menu item from the "File" menu or using the associated Hot key will open a print dialog to select the orientation of the printout. Figure 18 shows the print dialog that opens on a Windows NT system. A similar dialog will open for other operating systems. It is possible to set the orientation to PORTRAIT or LANDSCAPE, but changing the page margins will have no effect in the printout. Each level of the prototype hierarchy is sent to the printer as a different page. At the top of the printed diagram, the name of the parent operator of that data flow diagram is also printed.

6. File Operations

PSDL Editor provides only two kinds of file operations. Selecting the "Save" menu item under the "File" menu will save the prototype to the disk. This operation is not available when the status bar displays "Save not required". The editor is sensitive to the changes that are made to the prototype. If the prototype is modified, the status of the editor will be "Save required" and this will be displayed in the status bar. The actions that cause this situation include creating new components, moving components, resizing components, deleting components and changing the properties of components.

The other kind of file operation is the "Restore from save", which resets all the changes that are made to the prototype since it was last saved. The user will be prompted that all the changes will be lost before restoring the prototype. If the user acknowledges, the last saved version will be read from the disk and its prototype will be displayed.

If the prototype is modified, an attempt to close the editor without saving the prototype will launch a warning message. The user can save and exit the program, exit the program without saving or cancel the closing operation.

Table 5. Component Properties Dialog Functionality

C. CHANGING COMPONENT PROPERTIES

It is possible to change operator and stream properties by using a dialog window. This dialog opens when the left mouse button is double clicked over a component or when the "Properties" menu item is selected from the pop-up menu. Different property dialogs are available for operators and streams. Figure 19 and Figure 20 show examples of these dialogs. Some of the operator properties can be modified using four buttons that are located in the Tool Bar. Figure 21 shows these buttons. The components of the dialogs and the Tool Bar are indexed in the figures. Refer to Table 5 for their functionalities. The following sections describe the types of components that are used to edit PSDL component properties.

1. Display Only

These are the text areas that are disabled for user input and only display data values. State initial value (index 29) is an example of the display only text areas.

2. Data Entry

Data entry areas accept user input from the keyboard. It may be necessary to click on the text area before entering data. If the data entered is longer that the provided area, it is not possible to see the whole data at once. However it is possible to scroll to the end of the text area by using the mouse or the left and right arrow keys. The entries or modifications to a data entry area will only be accepted when the user hits the "Ok" button on the window that contains the data entry area.

3. Combo Boxes and Radio Buttons

Combo boxes and radio buttons provide a selection from provided choices. Only one of the choices can be selected at a time. Combo boxes have pull down menus to select the value. Triggering type selection (Index 4) is an example of the combo boxes. State stream selection buttons (Index 28) is an example of the radio buttons.

4. Text Editor

Text editor is a dialog window that is used to view or edit the properties of PSDL components. The user can scroll through the text within the editor by using the arrow keys or by positioning the mouse cursor. Figure 22 shows a text editor that displays the specification of an operator. This is launched by pressing the "Parent Specs" button on the tool bar (Index 34).

The user can make modifications in the text editor. These modifications will not be reflected to the prototype until the "OK" button is depressed. The modifications can be aborted by depressing the "CANCEL" button any time.

5. Id-list Editor

This dialog window is used to view or modify identifier lists. The modifications are not done directly by using keyboard on this editor. It views the identifiers as a list. Figure 23 shows an id-list editor that is accessed by clicking on the "Timers" button on the Tool bar (Index 35).

A new identifier can be added by pressing the "Add" button in the editor. A small dialog will open to enter a new identifier. This identifier is added to the list by pressing the "OK" button. Similarly, existing identifiers can be edited by pressing "Edit" button. A small dialog will open to edit the identifier. Figure 24 depicts the dialog that is used to edit the identifier "timer_1". If the "Edit" button is depressed when no selection is made from the id-list, a warning message will appear on the screen.

Existing identifiers can be deleted from the list by depressing the "Delete" button. Again, a warning message will be displayed when the user attempts for a delete operation without selecting an id first.

Similar to the text editor, the changes will be local to the id-list editor unless the user accepts them by depressing the "OK" button. All of the changes may be aborted by using the "Cancel" button.

V. CONCLUSION

A. RESULTS OF THIS RESEARCH

This research effort has resulted in a portable PSDL Editor for the Heterogeneous Systems Integrator. It is now possible to create PSDL prototypes on any machine and operating system where a Jdk1.2 compatible runtime environment can be found.

The performance of the program may depend on the underlying hardware that it is executed. We executed the program on a Pentium 120 MHz computer with 48 Mb RAM and on a Pentium II 400 MHz computer with 256 Mb RAM. While there was a significant difference in the performance of the two platforms, it was still possible create a prototype on the Pentium 120 MHz machine with a tolerable slowness in speed.

Basically, creating prototypes, displaying them on the user interface and modifying them are the same as CAPS Release 2.0 implementation. Users of previous CAPS versions will easily adapt to the new interface. There are some new features in this implementation, which do not affect the functionality of the program, but provide a friendlier interface and easier use.

The most powerful improvement that comes with this implementation is the addition of the Tree Panel to the Editor. The tree panel serves a few functionalities at the same time. It provides a better view of the overall prototype structure since all of the PSDL components can be seen in a hierarchy. The user can navigate through the prototype by clicking on the names of the components on the tree panel. Thus, it is possible to jump to any level in the hierarchy, which was not possible earlier.

The whole prototype is only checked syntactically when the user wants to save the prototype to the disk. In the previous implementation, some actions, such as navigating up or down through the prototype invoked a syntactic check on the prototype and then saved the prototype to the disk. If the user wanted to visit a component that was five levels down in the hierarchy, he/she had wait in all intermediate levels. These actions are removed with this implementation. Moreover, changes in one level will be propagated to the other affected levels when the user visits another level of the prototype.

The CAPS 2.0 PSDL Editor maintained two copies of the prototype data structure in the previous version. The Background Checker maintained one of the data structures while the Editor maintained the other. This was necessary, because the implementation languages of the Background Checker and the PSDL Editor were different. Synchronization of the data structures was necessary, which was degraded the performance of the program. The new implementation maintains only one copy of the data structures. The root operator is passed as an argument to the utilities such as the parser. The entire data structure can be reconstructed by getting the children of the root operator.

New features have been added to the user interface such as selecting all components, moving all components on the drawing panel, and tool tips for the buttons of the Tool Bar. These features were explained in the previous chapters.

We provided HTML documentation of the source code in Appendix C. The documentation was created automatically using Javadoc. It documents the interface of the classes (i.e., the methods and the fields of the classes) without struggling through the implementation. We also provided small definitions of the fields and the methods of the classes in the documentation. This documentation will ease the task of program understanding in future evolutions of the PSDL Editor software.

B. CRITICISMS OF THIS RESEARCH

Drawing of the components on the drawing panel is not very good. In particular, the circumference of the operators is not very smooth. Even though we used double precision classes, this problem was not solved. This problem may be due to the use of Swing components in the interface and if so, may be resolved with future releases of the Swing classes.

The PSDL Editor maintains a vector of the data flow components that are children of the current operator. While painting components on the screen, the program reads them from this vector and draws them into the drawing panel. When a component is dragged or resized in the drawing panel, all of the components are first cleared and then repainted on the screen. This extra delay is normally not very significant. But it may get significant on a slower machine, on a busy processor or if the program is used over a network.

C. RECOMMENDATIONS

With the previous versions of CAPS and this version of HSI, the user gets a feeling as if two separate programs are executing, the main window and the PSDL Editor. In a future implementation, these two seemingly separate programs can be incorporated into one user interface. The main program would include PSDL Editor as an internal frame in itself. Even more than one editor can be launched as internal frames inside the main window. This kind of an implementation will have a more modern look and feel than it has now.

The directory structure for the prototypes of CAPS and HSI depends on environment variables. A default directory to save and open prototypes is provided in both implementations. However, it would be better in my opinion, to leave the choice of the prototype directory to the user. Like some current Integrated Development Environments, the main program could open a project file, which contains all the information such as the locations of the prototype files, the version number, etc.

We had to give up many good ideas to provide backward compatibility with CAPS Release 2.0. The current version supports 64 colors and 6 fonts for the display of the components. These colors and fonts are indexed and do not allow any expansion. The structure of PSDL grammar need not change to support more fonts and colors since an expression is sufficient to provide a color or font value (Appendix A, grammar rule 23). The color values can be saved into the prototype as the integer RGB values. Fonts can be saved as string literals. This way, CAPS and HSI programs can support more colors and fonts.

APPENDIX A. PSDL GRAMMAR*

The following is the complete specification of the Prototype System Description Language (PSDL) syntax extended Backus-Naur Form (BNF).

The BNF description of PSDL specifies the sequence of symbols, which consolidate a valid PSDL prototype. BNF describes the language in terms of production rules. Each production rule equates a non-terminal symbol to a sequence of terminal and non-terminal symbols. Terminal symbols are symbols, which can occur in PSDL. Non-terminal symbols are metalinguistic variables whose value is a sequence of symbols, which represent a PSDL construct.

Terminals are represented as bold symbols. Non-terminals are enclosed in angle brackets, < and >. Additional metasymbols are introduced in the extension of BNF to reduce the number of productions and non-terminals. These metasymbols are defined as:

- Square brackets, [], to enclose optional items.
- Curly braces, { } , to enclose items which may appear zero or more times.
- Vertical bars, |, to represent a choice between items.
- Parentheses, (), to represent a grouping of items.

In some cases, the metasymbols are also used as terminals within PSDL. In order to avoid confusion, such terminal symbols are enclosed within single quotes.

For ease of reference, each production rule is numbered on the left hand side. These numbers are not part of the PSDL syntax.

APPENDIX B. PSDLParser and PSDLBuilder

PSDLParser and PSDLBuilder files contain JavaCC source code. JavaCC is a parser generator that is used with Java applications. It reads a grammar specification and converts it to a Java program that can recognize matches to the grammar.

JavaCC is available for download from the Internet. More information about JavaCC is available at www.suntest.com/JavaCC.

PSDLParser routines read an input stream that contains PSDL constructs. If it can successfully parse the stream, it will return without an exception. If any of the PSDL grammar constructs are violated, it will throw ParseException.

PSDLBuilder is similar to PSDLParser, but it also contains actions to create data structures to represent the prototype in PSDL Editor. These actions are embedded Java code. JavaCC automatically inserts these actions into the parser that it creates.
